Red wine, perhaps, is one of the constant companions of man since the first vine was grown and the first juice was squeezed out. Currently, there are more than 4,500 varieties of this great drink in the world.

Production of red wine

Production of red wine The primary raw material for the production of red wine is black grapes, the pigments of which are in the skin of berries, and give a color. The collected grapes are crushed, and all the resulting mass (including bones and peel) is infused for a particular time. In the process of maceration (the so-called insistence), the peel saturates the juice with color, aroma, and taste
