Bhoodan-Gramdan Movement is a precious chapter, not only in the history of Independent India, but also in the history of modern world. Never and nowhere in the recorded history has land been collected for the landless on such a massive scale through nothing but moral suasion. There is no record of a bigger and better non-governmental and nonviolent endeavour for the solution of a serious and pressing, yet intricate problem. This endeavour was all the more valuable, because it sought to empower people to solve their problems rather than claiming and posing to solve those problems. This empowerment was meant to initiate radical social transformation.

When Vinoba initiated the bhoodan movement in 1951, several forces had pounced upon the farmers and village communities were breaking up. The country had become Independent, but the villages had continued to be subjugated. Vinoba embarked on a fight for their freedom. Parag has given a thrilling account of the genesis and progress of this unique movement in detail.
