Disasters are a part of everyday life. From natural calamities such as earthquakes, hurricanes, and floods to human-induced disasters like nuclear accidents and industrial mishaps, our world is constantly under threat. Understanding the politics behind disaster risk creation is crucial for effective disaster management and response. In this article, we delve into the topic through the lens of Routledge Studies in Hazards and Disaster, a renowned publication series that focuses on multidisciplinary approaches to understanding the complexities of disasters.

The concept of disaster risk creation encompasses the processes and factors that contribute to the vulnerability of communities and individuals in the face of disasters. It involves an examination of how political, social, economic, and environmental factors influence the occurrence and impact of disasters.

Routledge Studies in Hazards and Disaster explores these intricacies, providing readers with in-depth analyses and discussions on the politics surrounding disaster risk creation.

The Role of Politics in Disaster Risk Creation

Politics plays a significant role in shaping the creation of disaster risks. Decisions made by governments and policymakers regarding urban planning, infrastructure development, and resource allocation can either minimize or exacerbate the vulnerability of communities to disasters. The interplay between power relations, economic interests, and social dynamics often contributes to the creation of risks that disproportionately affect marginalized populations.
