Generation Identity and Immigrant Roots:

The ASGC can be defined as individuals who were born overseas to Chinese immigrant parents. They straddle two worlds, often feeling caught between the cultural values of their heritage and the influence of the country they were raised in. This duality creates a rich tapestry of experiences, often leading to a blending of cultures and a distinctive sense of identity.

Growing up as an ASGC means navigating the expectations of Chinese traditions while simultaneously embracing the opportunities and freedoms provided by their adopted countries. Many interviewees spoke of the pressure to succeed academically and excel in extracurricular activities, reflecting the importance placed on education by their parents. These ambitious goals, while admirable, can sometimes lead to a sense of burnout and a longing for a more balanced lifestyle.

Embracing Cultural Heritage:

Contrary to stereotypes, the ASGC are far from disinterested in their Chinese roots. Many feel a deep connection to their heritage and actively seek ways to engage with their culture. Language classes, traditional dance lessons, and participation in community events are just a few ways in which the ASGC choose to maintain a strong link to their ancestral origins. Their efforts to preserve and celebrate Chinese traditions not only reflect their personal pride but also contribute to the multicultural fabric of their surrounding society.

Navigating Stereotypes and Prejudices:

Stereotypes about Chinese people exist in various societies, often perpetuated by media representations. The ASGC often find themselves at the receiving end of these stereotypes, grappling with preconceived notions of their identity. Being subjected to assumptions about academic prowess, submissiveness, or lack of creativity can be frustrating and challenging to overcome. Nevertheless, many ASGC interviewees are determined to break barriers and prove these misconceptions wrong, often pursuing non-traditional career paths and making significant contributions to their respective fields.

Challenges of Intercultural Relationships:

The ASGC are no strangers to intercultural relationships, as they often find themselves drawn to partners from different racial and ethnic backgrounds. These relationships can be both enriching and challenging, as they require negotiation and understanding of different cultural nuances. The experiences of ASGC individuals in such relationships further highlight the importance of embracing and appreciating cultural diversity within society.

The Road Ahead:

As the ASGC continue to carve their own paths, they become a testament to the dynamism and resilience of the Chinese diaspora. Their stories reveal a generation keenly aware of their position between two worlds, determined to forge unique identities while honoring their roots. Their contributions to society, be it in the arts, sciences, or business, demonstrate the vast potential that lies within this community.

, the Animals Second Generation Chinese represent a vibrant, multifaceted generation, defying stereotypes and shaping the landscapes of their respective societies. Their experiences shed light on the complexities of cultural identity and the ever-evolving nature of diasporic communities. By recognizing and celebrating the diversity within these communities, we take a step toward a more inclusive and understanding world.

(Note: the book is in Chinese only!)

The animals are back! This delightful series tells the story of what happens when the animals, like many young children, don't want to wash, eat, sleep, behave, share, go to school, take their medicine, or get vaccinated. In Episode 1, we talk about washing and personal hygiene. Our little readers will find that their favourite animals don't want to wash: "No, no, no... I don't want to wash!"... What can we do about it?

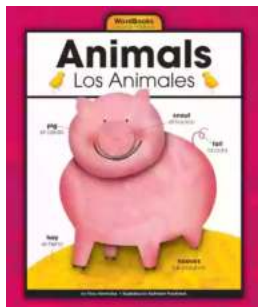

There is something special about this new book and one can only imagine how much it can benefit to so many children because of the very message it conveys about personal hygiene learning for children.

The book will also please all the parents who struggle with their little ones at bath time or at any other moment when personal hygiene is paramount.
